

I am writing to complain about the Sinclair Broadcasting Group's plan to air an anti-Kerry program during the election season. I assume this violates the FCC's own rules about partisan material as well as campaign finance law.

Ever since the Fair Use rules were changed, partisan political programming has become more and more prevalent. With these huge corporations having a lot at stake, they are willing to skew the information that the public receives on its own airwaves.

I believe the FCC should not provide bandwidth for organizations that will not use it fairly for the public good. Preventing Sinclair's airing of this 90-minute anti-Kerry ad would do a lot to restore public confidence in the FCC's regulatory leadership.

Peter Kurland